Kurdish leadership calls for better India ties

New Delhi wants to make it clear how serious it is about deepening ties with India.

PM Narendra Modi is set to return to India on Wednesday after two days of talks in the Middle East. But his return is likely to be overshadowed by the recent execution of three journalists in the Indian state of Kerala. The execution has raised fears of a backlash from the Indian government, which has been seeking closer ties with the region.

The Indian government has been eager to improve relations with the Middle East in recent years, as part of its broader strategy of diversifying its energy sources. But the execution of the journalists has raised concerns about the rule of law in the region, which has been a key focus of the Modi government's foreign policy.

The execution has also been condemned by the United Nations and the European Union, which have both expressed concern about the situation in the region. The European Union has threatened to impose sanctions on the country if the government does not address the concerns raised by the international community.

The Indian government has strongly denied any connection between the execution of the journalists and the recent upsurge in violence in the region. However, the move has sparked a wave of criticism in the region, with many calling for a review of the country's foreign policy.

Prime Minister Narendra Modi will arrive in New Delhi on Wednesday, bringing with him a message of peace and cooperation. The visit is expected to focus on strengthening ties between India and the region, as well as addressing concerns about terrorism and security.

The visit is also likely to include discussions on trade and investment, as well as the importance of promoting regional trade agreements and free trade zones. The Modi government has been keen to promote regional integration, with the aim of creating a common economic space that would allow for greater trade and investment.

The visit is expected to be a significant step forward in the quest for better ties between India and the region, as well as a significant boost for the Indian economy.
